Joyce Nadolny Shui works with students during a Chinese class offered through WSC's Community Education Department

The Purple School, a language-learning program for children, has come to Williston.

Joyce Nadolny Shui founded The Purple School in Washington in 2001 in order to support bilingualism among children. The school has expanded from teaching one language in a single classroom to a large program that includes nine languages. In addition to learning how to speak new languages in a caring, academic, and fun environment, children (ranging from infants to twelve years old) learn more about the cultures where those languages are spoken.

Nadolny Shui moved to Williston in 2009 when her husband, Dr. Raymond Nadolny, became president of Williston State College. With the community's influx of people from all over the world, she feels this is a perfect time and place to teach additional languages. Classes for infants, toddlers, and children up to age five in Chinese and Spanish are being held at WSC through the community education program. Spanish classes for children in kindergarten through sixth grade began this spring as part of St. Joseph's after-school program (students from all grade schools are welcome to register), and Nadolny Shui hopes to add Chinese classes to this program soon.
